

UISG Media Workshop – Nov. 18, 2022

Sources for free photos

It is not a good idea to go to the internet and lift out a picture without considering the source. You may violate some copyright law, and you may pick up some computer viruses.

Good free sources include Pixabay, Unsplash, and organizations like the United Nations and the New York Metropolitan Art Museum (and more and more museums are offering a search for public domain art like the Met does).

Here are some free sites:

Unsplash <https://unsplash.com/>

Pixabay <https://pixabay.com/>

Others:

Metropolitan Museum of Art:

<https://www.metmuseum.org/art/collection/search#!?perPage=20&searchField=All&showOnly=openAccess&sortBy=relevance&offset=0&pageSize=0>

Ministry of the Arts (www.ministryofthearts.org) is a free online digital resource

United Nations:

<https://dam.media.un.org/CS.aspx?VP3=DamView&VBID=2AM94SCXBEN&FR=1&W=1280&H=577>

<https://climatevisuals.org>

<https://blush.design/>

<https://www.humaaans.com/>

International Meeting of Communication for Religious Life

imcrl2023@uisg.org - www.uisg.org/en/communicating-religious-life - www.uisg.org

<https://freeillustrations.xyz/>

<https://www.blackillustrations.com/>

Wikimedia Commons is a commonly used place to search for free pictures, but not all in Wikimedia are free. And note that just because something is labeled Public Domain does not mean it is — someone may have just labeled it that way. <https://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/Category:Images>

More reliable are photos uploaded with a Creative Commons license — though you should click through and check the terms. You will find Creative Commons licensed work on Wikimedia and places like Flickr. When you use something from Creative Commons, that doesn't "belong" to you — that is permission given to you by the creator. If it says Creative Commons, it is free but sometimes comes with the conditions that you give credit to the creator and/or you don't use it for commercial purposes. So check the terms.